The winning project, 24, a new alliance between city and countryside.

The project proposes, for the suburbs of Lund (Sweden), to combine the new urban expansion area (approximately 40,000 houses) with a precious rural landscape. Returning to the wise theories of Ebenezer Howard's Garden City (1899), the author focuses on the density of buildings around public transport stations, and establishes a series of attractions in the green belt: agricultural greenhouses, markets, alternative production sites, which acquire a great social dimension, if not also productive. So the new device, instead of being a relationship of dependency from the center, becomes a place of progress independently, without compromise, even increasing it, the agricultural capacity. The program, developed in terms of time, is well articulated, promising a bucolic vision for the new urban life.

Project n.27, Double Function.

The project for the outer suburbs of Madrid, close to the M50 ring road, proposes an unusual polygonal mesh as a new rural order. Thinking about the organic growth of plants, which follows a spiral design, the new tissue grows outside Madrid with a series of decagonal cells, consisting of mixed use, including residences for short or long periods, and places of agricultural and energy production. Like the prehistoric cities in Anatolia, or the wide spread urbanizations of the Maya, the new city will be composed of small cores connected to each other in a nonlinear fashion, creating a complex carpet of buildings and planted voids. The area is completely pedestrian, with submerged and not visible roads, completely eliminating cars presence. The project is designed with precision and imagination, presenting a rural utopia that seems more organic than actual soil.

Project n.26, Bologna Edibile

Bologna Edibile is an invitation to recognize and enhance the natural resources existing in the territory of the city. It does not propose to build or to change the land use, but instead to use the design tools to have a depth knowledge and a greater accessibility to the spontaneous vegetation of the city. Without citing Gilles Clement's Third Landscape, the designer is was able to program a true realization of it all. Using the techniques of a blog, documenting the locations, intensities, and use of culinary products of urban wilderness, producing a register of natural resources in town. In addition, the elegant presentation demonstrates that the work of an architect, in the near future, may also be planning with the information instead of using concrete.

Project n. 83. Urban micro-surgery

This project deserves attention for its good sense and its proactive way: to save rural values, need facts planted in the city as a gesture of therapy. Proposes five possible interventions, therapies to heal unhealthy urban places, with green plantations. Zero impact on the urban question of volume, the proposal has great potential to treat environmental and social problems. The presentation convinces with its simple style in white, black and red.

Project n.47, Verde al centro

One value of this project is to keep the distance between the buildings, which are already evident in urban sprawl, turning the void in a new public landscape. Designed as a green belt (1 km long 200 m wide) between the edge of town and a small village, the new system combines several existing elements and adds new services (among other things, opposing a church and a mosque) in a location that offers pedestrian options or less direct routes by car.
